The risk for hepatocellular carcinoma was statistically significantly higher among women with chronic or active HBV infections and among those who had persistent HBV infection or underwent HBsAg-seroclearance during follow-up than among HBV-unexposed women. This risk decreased as parity increased, independent of HBsAg status and age.